Not illustrated. 1887 Excerpt: .are four distinctive systems of immediate supervision over the men, with which the custom of drawing and setting timber is more or less interwoven. 1. The whole pit, if small, and each seam or large district in an extensive colliery, is let to a set of butties, usually by the ton. The butties generally sublet each drift or other working place to two or three colliers, who either employ a loader only, as in the Lancashire method of working; or several hands, as in the third system, which is usual in the longwall method of working. The butties, or men in their pay, perform the duties of firemen; they are expected, not only to look to the forwarding of a large output, in which they are immediately interested, but also to look to the safety of the men. At some collieries a few main air road men are kept, and paid by the owners, but the butties are responsible for the air ways in the workings. The butties pay their men by the ton or by the day. Yardage is paid either by them or by the owners. In difficult places, where colliers or driftmen are unable to make an ordinary day s wage, they are occasionally paid day wage, about 4/-at present, but drift work is generally paid by the ton, except at a few collieries in the Kidsgrave district. 2. Districts are let to a set of butties, much in the same manner as...
