The best article is that on The Origin and Nature of Morality, which shows how beliefs are beyond our own control, and that morality rests upon the firm foundation of social exigencies. In the paper entitled, Threading the Way, the coarse language of freethought journals is severely reprobated. The most orthodox people will welcome this as a shake of the hand from an unexpected quarter, and will note that the writer on The Future of Agnosticism is not very sanguine. And who can say there is no room in these days for a sect which declares that the one essential thing for us just now in this age is to get rid of false certitudes and unwarranted assertions ? ELOCUTION. In their primer of Elocution, Messrs. Pearson and Waithman dilate with no inconsiderable fervour upon the manifold advantages which accrue to the fortunate possessor of a cultivated mode of address and speech. What dire consequences ensue from the total want of it the following extract shows: In the time of Jephthah, judge of Israel, 1,139 years before the Christian era, 42,000 Ephraimites died upon the brink of the Jordan because they could not frame to pronounce with Gileadite accuracy the simple password, Shibboleth. It is sincerely to be hoped that Messrs. Pearson and Waithman are not of an ambitious turn of mind, otherwise it is just within the range of possibility that we shall have a couple of Jephthahs come to judgment,...
